

Lawsuit Alleges U.S. Allowed Species Extinction

November 9, 2005 9:30 a.m. EST

Yvonne Lee - All Headline News Staff Reporter

Washington, D.C. (AHN) - A lawsuit filed by environmental groups against the Interior Department contends the government has allowed 283 species facing extinction to languish without protection under the Endangered Species Act.

Some 24 candidate species have gone extinct waiting for protections in the past 32 years, the Center for Biological Diversity in Arizona, Forest Guardians in New Mexico and other advocacy groups allege in the suit, filed late Monday in U.S. District Court.

Noah Greenwald, a conservation biologist with the Arizona-based group, says the Interior Department hasn't acted as quickly as the law requires in adding wildlife to its endangered species list.

The species - ranging from the Dakota skipper butterfly in the northern Great Plains, to the Oregon spotted frog - have waited an average of 17 years to be added to the list, the suit says.

Interior Department officials say they had not reviewed the groups' complaint and couldn't comment.

Craig Manson, assistant Interior secretary for wildlife, has previously said the law itself is "broken" from similar suits because the Fish and Wildlife Service has to spend too much of its resources defending itself in court rather than serving the best interests of wildlife.